St. Joseph Regional Catholic School

- Its beginning -

(Excerpt taken from a letter by, Annette Smith, first school secretary)

When Msgr. Cornelius Cahill planned to build St. Joseph School, he contacted the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur in Methuen. In 1958, the sisters arrived to teach. At that time, they lived at St. Monica's convent in Methuen, and each day a parent would pick them up and drive them back to Methuen. The school was opened with two classrooms, grades one and two, with plans to open a new grade each year. By 1963 with eight grades filled, plans were made to add a second grade to each class. Now the school was complete with 16 classrooms in operation.

In 1960, Msgr. Cahill broke ground to build a new rectory across the street from the Church. When completed, the priests moved into the new rectory and the sisters moved into the old rectory. In 1963, the old rectory was torn down and a new convent was built on the third floor of the school building; sixteen bedrooms and a larger suite for the sister principal. The sisters were so happy to have their new home. The sixteen bedrooms in the convent were never filled because in 1964, it became necessary to hire a lay teacher since there weren't enough sisters available for St. Joseph School. Soon afterwards, it became necessary to hire a lay person almost every year.

The original school included the auditorium and the second floor of the school separated into eight classrooms. The bottom floor was not separated into classrooms in 1958. However, the Salem School District was in dire need of space because the town was growing and the public schools were bursting at the seams. So the Salem School District contacted Msgr. Cahill and offered to finish the downstairs of the school, furnish it, and rent the space for classrooms for public school children. The town rented the space for two years. By this time, St. Joseph School needed the space because for a second class of each grade.

By 1965, the school was so popular that parents lined up hours before registration time in order to save a spot for their child. The school could take only 80 children for the two first grades; after that, children were placed on a waiting list. By 1965, Msgr. Cahill had built a school, a rectory, a convent, and Julie Hall.

When the school was opened, the children's uniforms were as follows: boys in white shirts, dark trousers with a dark green tie with the school emblem; girls in white blouses, a dark green jumper with an X type tie with the school emblem emblazoned on the jumper. A beanie for the girls was mandatory on Fridays for Mass.

By 1972, there were 510 children in the school and the school was still a parish school. Father Cahill retired in 1973 and Fr. John Horan became the pastor. Soon afterwards, Fr. Horan received a mandate from the Bishop that the school must regionalize. The school became part of four parishes: St. Joseph; Mary Queen of Peace; St. Matthew; and Holy Angels. St. Joseph school became St. Joseph Regional School.

The convent was no longer needed to house sisters, so the school began to move classrooms to the top floor. The Fourth Grades were the first two classrooms to move up along with the library in one of the larger rooms, and the porch became the new computer room.

Focusing on the entire well being of the students over the years, Integrated Arts in the form of Physical Education, Music, Art & Technology classes were added. After-school clubs and athletic programs grew, a hot lunch program started, guidance department services became available, a before and after-care program evolved and transportation program through a Regional bus was offered for residents outside of Salem.

St. Joseph Regional Catholic School - an outstanding reputation with a proud history and a bright future.
